Black Student Protest at the University of Oregon: Fifty Years in the Making

Presenter: Desirae Brown, McNair Scholars

Faculty Advisor: Dr. Debra Thompson

Research Question:

- Nearly 50 years apart, why are the Black student demands to the University of Oregon administration almost identical?
- America has seen large strides and steps-backwards in racial advancement; why did the UO receive the same complaints decades later?
- Has the University of Oregon, at any point in time, prioritized the social, academic, physical and cultural existence of its Black students?

Argument:

Both time periods of protest experienced little or delayed longstanding social, academic or cultural change at the institution.
 Lack of institutional change for Black students at UO, has influenced the lack of increase of the Black student population, lack of increased retention rates of Black students, and lack of opportunity to cultivate a strong social and cultural community amongst each other.

UO Black Student Union Task Force Demands 1968

1. More Black dormitory counselors. At least three Black students assigned to a dorm...*

2. ...the factor of "need" should be the most relevant criterion for the evaluation of an application for aid.*

- 3. [the necessity of] the hiring of Black coaches... That scholarships for Black athletes should be extended to cover their educational career.*
- 4. ...that Afro-American history, and Black culture be instituted in the regular academic curriculum...
- That Swahili and/or other African languages should be taught in the regular curriculum in the language department.
  - ...programs in African Studies and Afro-American Studies, be established on the undergraduate and gradate levels.
    That Black professors must be hired.*

12. Commit to keeping and publishing data on Black student acceptance, retention, and safety.

Conclusions after 2015:

- 3.5 of the Demands have been met as of 2020.
- To change the narrative, the UO must actively commit to engaging the needs of Black students.
- Actively support its Black students and faculty and work to engage them in the larger campus community.
- If the University of Oregon fails to support its Black community now, they may expect a third wave of protest
